Cal Poly Pomona Club Plant Hopes at Innovation Brew Works

Students from the Los Rios Horticulture and Los Rios Agribusiness Agrology Clubs at Cal Poly Pomona recently teamed up to plant hops at Innovation Brew Works.

The club members planted the hops right outside the brewery's main patio on April 21.

The Los Rios Horticulture Club, one of the oldest clubs on campus, is for Cal Poly Pomona students who have an interest in the art of gardening, while the Los Rios Agribusiness Club serves students who are interested in marketing in agriculture or retail sales.

Under the direction of Aaron Fox, assistant professor of horticulture and crop science, the two clubs planted hop rhizomes, small roots that are cut from a mature hop plant.

More specifically, they planted climbing hops, which is a high-volume variety known for its distinctive spicy, pungent character. Climbing hops grow best in dry, hot climates.

"We put some good planting soil in the ground and planted the rhizomes," says Fox, who described the process as a "fair experience."

The club will soon be putting up a sign to support the shoots from the rhizomes when they grow.

The two clubs will continue to expand their learning by doing experiences by training the plants throughout the quarter.
